INTRODUCTION

The week after liberation in Europe, the roads were teeming with displaced persons, refugees and peoples of all nationalities. They were all going somewhere.

In the heart and mind of the Jew was only one thought: "Where can I find a trace of my mother, my wife, my child, or any other surviving relative or acquaintance."

The story of Deutsches Museum in Munich has been told hundreds of times. This first transient camp became the background in the initial attempts to locate relatives. It is the story of how a Jew wrote his name on a corner of a huge wall there; soon there were thousands of names for all to see and perhaps to discover that some beloved one had passed by recently.

The work has not changed basically since those first days. A very important part of our activities has been the finding and re-uniting of families, and the record of achievement of the Berlin AJDC Tracing Office has made us proud of our chance to play a role in this work.

It is of significance that Mr. Larry Lubetsky, one of the survivors, set up, organized and directed the entire tracing operations in this area. That one of the people is responsible for this accomplishment and for this report, is a goal in itself. We have the additional responsibility to continue our activities until the last case has been closed, and the last Jew has found his home.

INTRODUCTION

The week after liberation in Europe, the books were returned with grateful person letters and people in the pockets. There were all foreign comments.
In the pocket mind of the few we only one thought: “Where can I find a book on the nation or will child of my other surviving relative or pronoun...”
The story of Doncaster Museum in Yorkshire was not just another of these. This isn’t transient easy because the experience in the initial attempt to locate and explore it is the work of a few more who have no chance at a huge world.
And the few were unsuccessful or names for all to see and explore.
Discover that some preserved one andpassed by accident
The work has not changed especially since these few years. A vast importance part of our activities and such the growth and networking of libraries and the growth of exploration of the Royal A.D.C. Travels and others the room of our chances in order to grow in this work.

It is of significance that all A.D.C. Travels one of the survivorst of the reaccessing andglancing in the series in this area. The order of the people is responsible for the recommendation and for this report is a part in itself. We leave the national repositories to continue our activities until the last case has been passed and the last few pages turned.
